

QUARTERLY REPORT Q4/2023

New global trouble spots and a drop in interest rates

REVIEW

The fourth quarter began with the outbreak of another crisis in the Middle East, as the conflict between Israelis and Palestinians flared up again in the aftermath of a terrorist attack by Hamas. The fact that a full-scale conflagration has so far been avoided has reassured the financial markets.

Although inflation has declined significantly, key interest rates in Western countries have remained largely unchanged. In the USA, the economy was supported by the continuing strength of the consumer sector and the country's fiscal policy, while its monetary policy with its high key interest rates had the opposite effect. In China, some foreign companies withdrew their capital due to declining confidence. Unlike the sustained weakness of the real estate sector, the overall Chinese economy was supported by high consumer spending. Given its traditional trade surplus, Switzerland was not entirely immune to the global slump in demand. Here too, growth was driven by domestic consumer demand coupled with record population growth in 2023.

After a turbulent October, the stock markets regained confidence and closed November and December on a positive note. Technology stocks continue to support the markets.

The bond markets were volatile in Q4, and yield curves remained inverted. With inflation rates going down faster than expected, market participants harboured hopes of faster key interest rate cuts. As a result, yields on fixed-interest investments fell and their valuation rose.

OUTLOOK

High interest rates are increasingly holding the global economy back, and the leading economic indicators in Western countries are all in negative territory. Market participants do not expect central banks to start lowering key interest rates until the second quarter of 2024. Real wages are falling as a result of higher inflation, which is likely to have a negative impact on private consumption and hence the economy. This means that market participants' expectations remain subdued. Fixed-interest securities remain attractive, especially compared to the high valuations of some equities, primarily in the technology sector.
